Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct answer to each of the questions from 1 to 7.

Rainforests are disappearing in tropical areas around the world. They are being cut down, burned and damaged through a process called “deforestation”. This is a serious problem in developing countries within tropical regions. The impact of deforestation also has vast global implications. It is, therefore, very important to find solutions to these problems. Unfortunately, progress in this area has been very slow.

According to World Bank statistics, many developing countries, such as Brazil, Ecuador, and Indonesia had lost almost half of their rainforests by 1991. Worldwide, in 1800 there were 7.1 billion acres of tropical forests, while today there are only 3.5 billion acres. Recent statistics suggest that an area of tropical forest larger than North Korea is deforested every year.

Most importantly, the rainforests play an important role in the health of our environment. Trees and other plants act as filters that clean pollutants out of the air and produce clean air. With air pollutant increasing as forests decline, the world is facing a potential crisis with regard to air quality.

Poverty is one of the main forces behind deforestation in tropical countries, where many rely on farming as a way of life. The most practical method is “slash and burn” agriculture, in which a small area of trees is cut down and then burned to fertilize the soil. For a period of time, the soil can produce good crops, but rain gradually washes away the nutrients, reducing fertility and causing crops to grow at a slower rate. Eventually, the soil can no longer support crops, and farmers are often forced to abandon the land.

Government policies also contribute to the destruction of rainforests. In countries like Brazil, much of the rainforest is owned by the state. However, the state does not have enough resources to control access to the forests. Therefore, the government allows people to claim area of land within the forest. To do this, people must clear the land that they want to claim. Small farmers, then, often clear plots and then sell them. They then move to a new area, clear it, and then sell it again. While this is good for farmers, it is highly destructive to forests.

Larger companies contribute to their own problems. Logging companies can do a great deal of damage on their own, but they also cause secondary damage through their effects on small farmers. Often, road construction companies hired by the government claim land that they clear during their projects, thus pushing small farmers further into forests. In addition, the government might set low tax rate for agricultural production. Corporations and wealthy investors buy up lands, and the small farmers are forced to find plots in unclaimed areas of the forests.

The problem of deforestation is strongly affected by poverty in developing countries. Clearly, any long-term solution to deforestation must focus first on how poverty can be reduced. Any other solution can only be a temporary measure.

Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct answer to each of the questions from 8 to 12.

The integration of technology in education has revolutionized teaching and learning. Digital tools like interactive whiteboards, online courses, and virtual classrooms offer new opportunities. One significant benefit is personalized learning through adaptive software, which tailors content to individual student needs, keeping them engaged and motivated.

Technology also provides access to vast resources such as online libraries and digital textbooks, encouraging independent learning and critical thinking. Additionally, digital platforms promote collaboration and communication, enabling students to work together and teachers to communicate with students and parents effectively.

However, challenges exist. The digital divide, or the gap between those with and without access to technology, can exacerbate educational inequalities. Moreover, prolonged screen time can lead to physical and mental health issues, such as eye strain and reduced attention spans. Balancing technology's benefits with its potential drawbacks is crucial for creating an effective educational environment.
